MODESTY. A rose that was wet with the morning dew, Its crescent proudly raised; It look'd at its neighbour the violet blue,

It raised its leaves in pride and scorn, And frown'd on the innocent flower; And asked why a thing so lowly born, Had dar'd to enter the bower?

And seem'd wondrously amaz'ed.

The sweet little violent answer'd not, / But its modest colours display'd; And smil'd in silent contempt at what The rose had tauntingly said.

The rose swell'd up like the frog of old, And bloated itself with pride; To think the violet had been so bold, Its dignity to deride.

His dazzling rays its lamp put out, And it died without a si h. When gaudy pride that spurns the earth, Hath found an early tomb,

Contented with thy lowly birth,

It thus continu'd to fret and pout,
