POOR HUMANITY.

In purple robe and jeweled crown, The great king sits in regal state, And if he smile or if he frown A hundred noble lords who wait Bow at his throne; yet what is he, In spite of royal robe or crown, In spite of kingly smile or frown,

But part of poor humanity!

Outside the palace gate there stands A beggar, with a face of woe, Asks alms of those that come and go-A brother of the king is he, A common Father both may claim,

See in the careless crowds that pass Along the city's busy street, The rich and poor; there, too, alas! Bold shame and modest virtue meet; Brothers and sisters all are we, Whatever is our worldly lot,

Who pities poor humanity.

It matters not by whom begot-A part of poor humanity! The rich man sipping costly wine, Whate'er the foolish worldling thinks, Is linked with him who from the vine Crushes the juice the other drinks-

Though nursed in easy luxury, he May scorn the laborer in his heart, Forgetful that each forms a part Of that poor thing humanity!

Who toils through all the livelong day, Toils till her weary work is done To drive the famished wolf away-A sister wan and pale is she, To her, that other, young and fair, Who rides behind you stylish pair, A part of poor humanity!

Be ever this our earnest prayer-Oh give us grace that we may see

The faults that every virtue mar, And strength to bear the ills that are The lot of poor humanity!
