TO THE MEMORY OF MAJOR RINGGOLD. BY EDWARD C. JONES.

This crimson from my wound which flows, Should nerve thy arm against our foes When my last debt is paid.

Not on the downy couch at home, Where lov'd ones to my side would come, Would I desire to die-But where the rattling volley's given, While heroes 'neath the arch of Heaven Are pealing, "Victory!"

No, stay no here, upon the field My spirit joyonsly I yield, With few to note its flight-Here, gazing on the banner's fold, Whose stars and stripes won tame of old, I sink to shades of night.

On to the rescue, comrade, on! This day be glorious laurels won, To twine around thy brow-We promised each with purpose high, To conquer in the strife, or die-

Go and redeem the vow. The bugle's clang, the cannon's roar Re-echo on my ear no more, Nor rouse me to the fray-But, comrade, thou dost yet remain,

Go, and the warrior's chaplet gain, Haste to the ranks away. He spake, and vielded to his gloom, For soon the dim sepulchral gloom Had settled round his brow-But, nobly had he done his part. And deep within Columbia's heart
