POET'S CORNER.

THE WOUNDED VOLUNTEER. BY ROWENA BARTLETT.

They laid him to rest when the battle was done, And our flag was proudly waving, To tell to the world of a victory won Where the red blood the earth was laving.

They laid him to rest, and the setting sun Shone palely o'er his pillow, Brought the sound of the distant billow.

And he breathed his sigh in that lonely spot, While his comrades in pity were gazing.

Alas! for the sleeper! how soon his song Of glory and conquest was ended; The night-winds may bear the echoes along Where he died far away, unfriended.

MATRIMONY. "Tis time that you should take a wife, To render happy coming life; I know a lass will suit you well." "Let all do better-I do well." "You do not know her worth; she's young And fair as ever poet sung." "If young and pretty, she is sly, And danger lurks within her eye." "Her family is ancient, good." "Then pride pursues her like a flood." "By nature she is kind, will be A tender hearted friend to thee." "Yes, Jealousy will seize the soul, And rule and rage without control." "She is intelligent, 't is true, And wise." 'I cannot wed a blue." "Thousands of gold and silver make her-"
