HIDE THEM AWAY.

BY ANN PAGE. Hide them, oh hide them all away-His cap, his little frock, And take from out my aching sight You curling, golden lock; Ah, once it waved upon his brow!-Ye torture me anew,-Leave not so dear a token here-Ye know not what you do!

Last night the moon came in my room, And on my bed did lie; I woke, and in the silver light I thought I heard him cry;

I leaned towards the little crib, The curtain drew aside Before, half sleeping, I bethought Me, that my boy had died!

On aught that breathes of him! Oh. take away the silver cup, His lips have touched its brim. Take the straw hat from off the wall, 'Tis wreathed with withered flowers; The rustling leaves do whisper me Of all the loved lost hours.

The rattle, with its music balls-Oh, do not let them sound! The dimpled hand that grasped them once Is cold beneath the ground; The willow wagon on the lawn Through all my tears I see; Roll it away, oh! gently roll,

His shoes are in the corner, nurse; His little feet no more Will patter like the falling rain, Fast up and down the floor. And turn that picture to the wall-His loving mournful eye Is piercing through my very heart, Again I see him die!

It is an agony!

Oh, anguish! how he gazed on me When panted out his breath! I never, never knew before How terrible was death. My own-my own-my only one-Art thou forever gone? O God! help me to bear the stroke

That leaves me all alone!
