POETRY.

From Godey's Lady's Book for June. THE TWO PORTRAITS. BY RICHARD COE, JR. MY MOTHER. My mother-she is aged now, And many a silver hair Is sadly parted on her brow,

Oh! she has been so kind to me, So loving and sincere, That I would make her half forget She ever knew a tear!

Deep furrow'd o'er with care:

Yet will mine eyes o'erflow with tears, My bosom heave a sigh, To know that in a few short years My mother dear must die! For who will guide my manhood then, Or watch my steps in love, Methinks I hear her sweet voice say,

"My child, thy God above!" Then will I heed my mother's voice, Her counsel sweet obey, Thus may I soothe her sorrows here, Thus cheer her latest day: And when my hour of death shall come-As come full soon it must-May her dear angel form receive My spirit from its dust!

MY WIFE. I HAVE a wife—a dear young wife— A creature pure and mild. As happy and as innocent As any laughing child: Her eyes are brighter than the stars That shine within the sky-

Yet still they glow with deepened light When I am nigh! I have a wife—a dear young wife— A creature kind and good, Companion of my lighter hours, Or those of darkened mood: Her voice is sweeter far to me

Than carol of a bird-

A purer tone I well believe Was never heard! Then may my wife-my dear young wife, Whose love is so sincere, Who smiles when joy lights up my face, Or gives me tear for tear: May she, now sitting by my side,

Her head upon my breast,

Be kindly blessed of her God

When I'm at rest! ON RETURNING AGIFT OF AFFECTION BY GILES MILDEW. TAKE back the ring so fair and plain,

Thy love's most fitting token, For now affection's brittle chain, Is, like this trifle-broken. At first did this delusive toy Its purest rays impart,

An emblem of thy heart. But now the worthless, glittering thing, Is broken and despised; I found what seem'd a golden ring, Was only galvanized!

Twould prove, I thought, with secret joy,

And thus thy charms, by art displayed, May for true merit pass, But time reveals that thou art made Like it-of gilded brass.
