

I really believe, he wishes he had been killed instead of the other. Your Ladyship would be astonished to see how he afflicts himself; and, I think, considering, it has ended vastly happy. To be sure, people of fashion contrive in general, that neither party is hurt, and that's immensely clever; but I suppose it will happen otherwise sometimes. The Marquis is extremely good-natured, and, I dare say, it was an accident; or, may be, it might be owing, some how, to the awkwardness of Mr. Francfort; for people of that rank, you know, it cannot be expected that they should be, in any thing, a match for their superiors. Your Ladyship diverts me extremely, by
