THE INVOLUNTARY INCONSTANT. 21 happy parent; let me then sum up all by saying, that he would have been just, had there been no laws in the Muin world; and prudent, had there been no calumny. Yet am I not impatient at my loss, but to be insensible to it, would be not to have been sensible to the blessing I once enjoyed. The Ino virtues and rare qualities of my son, Muin have left in my heart a veneration for that name and character, which I fear is unknown to you, from the little reason you have to approve the conduct of your's. This, my dear brother, makes me desirous to have Charles drawn once, at least, from obscurity and oblivion, in hopes that you may in your turn taste that happi-
