There is one great object of man although he may have many there will be one greater than the rest With the moral man his greatest object will be to do good to his fellow men to walk upright in the sight of God, with the fashionable man it will be to appear dressed a little more superb than the rest of his associates With the miser it will be to get money No matter how better by fraud or by honesty he cares but little who suffers as long as his coffers are filled but there is one more man of whom I will speak it of the Libertine the most selfish of all he values not the Gold that his forefathers have gained for him he values not the comfort he may deprive of himself he cares not how many broken hearts he makes all his aim is to gain the affection of her he is in Love no not Love but her who he is seeking to undo he will buy with Gold he will deceive may he will even swear away his soul to accomplish his hellish designs he will murder steal and commit any other crime to accomplish the ruin of a poor unprotected female for a half hour self gratification he will sell his own soul
