J. J.'s dander rises; plans to sue cops

By BAKER E. MORTEN

"If a man makes a mistake, is he doomed to pay for it the rest of his life? I don't think it's right. I feel we have a strong case against the New York City Police Department."

Jazz trombonist J. J. Johnson was bitter when he said that Wednesday night while filling an engagement along with drummer Max Roach at the Lucky Number Rose Room here.

He had reference to a suit to be filed by his attorney, Maxwell T. Cohen of New York, against the city's Cabaret Employee's Licensing Bureau, an agency which determines if a musician convicted of a crime may work there.

JOHNSON SAID his suit will challenge the validity of the police licensing system.

J. J., a consistent poll winner for his trombone versatility in jazz, contends that as a result of the Cabaret Employees Licensing Bureau, some 5,000 national and local musicians have been unable to work in New York City.

He said the suit, a 46-page complaint being brought by himself, pianist Beril W. Rubenstein and bandleader Johnny Richards, will seek to abolish the agency. The petition is slated to be filed in New York Supreme Court this month, Johnson said.

The whole thing has to do with musicians once involved with narcotics, but who have since gone straight. The regulation says that a musician convicted of a crime must go before the licensing bureau and he judged as to his present fitness to work.

• • • •

"IF IN the opinion of the bureau, a musician is fit, he may or may not be issued a permit to work in established night clubs.

"The musician is charged two dollars for the permit to work. This money is placed in the Police Pension Fund," Johnson told the AFRO.

He charges in his suit that the New York Police Department has "illegally, unlawfully and maliciously" refused to issue a permit to work in a night club.

ment to one club for a short duration.

"Because of this discriminatory practice, they are many musicians in New York City who have been offered jobs but cannot take them," the noted jazz trombonist asserted, adding:

"My lawyer has combed the city statute books and can't find a regulation anywhere giving the bureau the right to charge musicians $2 for work permits.

"It's absolutely unfair for a musician trying to go straight to be subjected to such treatment. New York is a mecca for musicians. If they can't work there, where can they work?

"IT ALL boils down to musicians being denied the right to work because of a past mistake."

J. J., who alternated his quintet with that of Max Roach during the evening of music, said many "big-names" in jazz might be involved in the litigation. He declined to elaborate on names.

He explained that his prospective suit was gaining support among civic groups in New York.

Roach, who embarked upon a lighter vein of conversation, wanted it to be known that his present jazz aggregation is the possibly the youngest in jazz.

GEORGE COLEMAN on tenor sax, Art Davis on bass, Ray Draper on tuba and Booker Little on trumpet comprise the Roach clan.

Appearing with J. J.'s group was trumpeteer Nat Adderly, whose drive combined with that of the group was hard, but smooth.

Roach was all arms on drums, proving delightfully why he is perhaps the nation's number one jazz drummer.

J. J. was exceedingly soulful in his approach, though he and Roach stayed with their separate groups and did not team up.

ASKED WHAT direction he thought Jazz was headed toward next, Max quipped:

"I hope it heads into the
