U.S. project to train 600 for new jobs

WASHINGTON — About 600 waitresses have trained, or are in training under Manpower, Development and Training Act programs throughout the nation. A newly-instituted program in Hartford, Conn. typifies the project.

Under the program, conducted by the Association of Connecticut Restaurants, 50 young women have undergone the nine-weeks' training and many are already employed at first-rate restaurants in the Harford area.

Local operators of quality restaurants are actively supporting the effort in hopes of relieving an acute shortage of qualified waitresses. For many of the girls, recruited from the ranks of domestics and welfare recipients, the salaries plus tips they now receive far exceed their previous income.

After the intensive three-week training period, the young women receive an additional six weeks of on-the-job training at which time they are paid full salary by their employers. While receiving institutional training, the trainees receive an allowance averaging $98 per person for the three-week period. The federal government pays all of the training costs.
