Highlight: The L'Ecole Foods

Baltimore's International Culinary Arts Institute has opened a unique Gourmet Food Store, L'ecole Foods its first floor Gourmet Shop of South Gay Street. L'ecole is indeed "the school," for although it is a showcase for students in the Advanced Restaurant Skills Program (students in Garde Manger may be viewed through a glass wall in the rear of the shop), it will provide senior students with experience in producing gourmet food items. Receipts from paying guests will afford the students an opportunity to prepare a wider variety of foods and dishes, including those with more costly ingredients than the school can provide without raising its modest tuition.

The entire food production operation is run by students under the supervision of their chef instructors. Items offered for sale provide students with a wide variety of production, especially for baked goods. Items produced change according to the curricular, with core items produced daily.

The Institute produced food and unusual accessory products are among the more unusual available in fine food shops anywhere.

Among noticeable patrons are Carol Channing, a luncheon for members of the German Parliament, cocktails for Alan Alda and a birthday party for Eubie Blake, as well as many other celebrities who have enjoyed, experienced, and participated in the Institute's educational process and considered by many to be one of the highlights when visiting Baltimore.

Musical Notes

Update: Earth, Wind and Fire

By Schanolla Barnes

The success of Earth, Wind and Fire, over the last several years, has ben phenomenal. As a group, they have sold over 36 million records, won six Grammy Awards, and demonstrated an uncanny ability to consistently cut across all musical barriers.

One of their earliest albums, That's the Way of the World, originally conceived as a movie soundtrack, displayed to the world the group's musical power and appeal. Following LPs, "Spirit," "All in All," and "I Am," have only perpetuated the idea.

Phillip Baily, lead vocalist and member of the group since the early '70s, comments, "In the public's eyes, we're just perfect — when people look at us, they say 'those guys are just incredible,' but, we are not perfect. We just want to play well and put on a good show. We want black people to be proud of us.

"People look at us and the way we've done things, and if that inspired them to achieve the same level of diligence of perfection and excellence, then cool, because we've done what we're supposed to do."

Baily insists that this inspiration will perpetuate itself because someone must set a standard that is above the norm.

Verdine White, bass player, tends not to take such a subdued and modest approach in attributing the group's success.

Earth Wind and Fire

"Because we're good! Simply put! We are well-oiled, well-organized — that's why we've been around for awhile." He continued that, "There aren't many people around that can outplay or outperform us. We're just good!"

Along with their success, Earth, Wind and Fire has developed their philosophical visions extensively. The wholesomeness of their lyrics has translated into a reputation for the pursuit of peace and brotherhood through their music. So intent are their convictions, they have even been incorporated into their stage performances with the help of special visual effects and intricate choreography.

According to group leader, Maurice White, "Music has the power of drawing positive energies together." He relates the theme of the group's latest LP, Powerlight, directly to the "chakras," or vital centers of energy and life.

"The 'chakras' are our connection to the cosmos, or inner light. We're trying to move people towards the light . . . with music."
