—Death too close

any major decisions for at least a year after his wife died. "I'm convinced that saved me. During that time, I might have done something really foolish because I was still in shock."

He especially cautions widows and widowers not to rush into another marriage.

"A lot of people feel the need for a dependable companion after they lose a spouse. But I would suggest to anyone, male or female, to take the time to sort their feelings out first to get the companionship you want," he said. "A lot of people will try to set you up with someone. Everyone had someone for me. But you have to find that person yourself. It has to feel right to you and you'll know it when it's right."

He says he realizes now that he didn't allow himself to grieve during the first six months after his wife's death partially because he wanted to seem strong for the rest of the family. "A person must grieve and cry and cry and cry. Get it all out, so you can go on with living."

He also recommends talking with friends and getting involved in group activities. "You need a special friend, buddy, or minister you can call and just talk to when you get depressed. You have a terrible need to talk to someone sometimes when you can't call a professional counselor.

He said he also regrets that he waited so long to give his wife's things away and make some changes to the house so he wouldn't be so reminded of her. "Clean out the house right away—or better yet, get someone else to. It's a terrible thing to do, but it is the easiest in the long run."

He says he wishes now, too, that he had buried his wife in a cemetery across town and not in one he has to drive by every day going to and from work. "Every time I drive by, I think of her and it makes me sad," he said. "And that first year, I went to see her every day just to talk to her and cry. I became so dependent, and I think it made it harder for me to get on with living."
