Anti-killing group launches role model-talent search

By Valerie Smith-Madden
AFRO Staff Writer

Wednesday evening, the "Stop The Killing" coalition kicked off its "Operation Role-Model Talent Search" program, a program which the Rev. Willie Ray feels is a way to reach the teen population of Baltimore. Ray is the head of the coalition.

"We have a sub-culture that we're pretty afraid of, a subculture that we're not addressing. These kids have the leadership potential, but they're misusing it," he explained.

"They're the ones creating the problems and doing the killing," he added.

Calling this faction, the "lost generation," and further explaining this faction as a minority of the total teen population, Ray said his program will unite those teens and community persons who have made significant personal or business achievements and presenting them to teens or alternatives to emulate.

The program has three phases, according to Ray.

Phase one brings teens and adults together, giving the teens an opportunity for adult guidance and an ear to hear gripes on teen social ills and negative behavior.

In phase two, talented teens will be recruited in the community who lack moral support and structure in their lives.

Phase three aims to reach the potential youth offender and the potential substance abuser, and provide them with alternative lifestyles.

"We want to get the kid with the gun, the kid with the cocaine, take him out of the community in a brotherly way and show him another world."

Ray surmises that if say, a Maurice "Peanut" King could have be reached and shown a different value system, and a different concept of success, a legitimate concept of success, he could have turned part of the sub-culture generation around.

"He set an example of false success," said Ray.

When asked why he considered it a false success, Ray answered, "It was an immoral and illegal approach to success that was short-lived. It had a disastrous ending."

"I've found out that everyone who lives in the community is not a Yo, although the community is dominated by them," he mused.

"We want to reach them."

Ray hopes that one way to reach them is through talent. Through a series of talent searches on a monthly basis at the "Starr's Place," some teens have been able to show off their stuff.

Now Ray has begun a talent search to be held monthly at various locales. This vehicle, in addition to helping the teens self-esteem, will teach them about such things as discipline.

Contestants in the talent search will receive $50. "We'll also provide them with management to further their careers," he added.

"We'll try to direct them to various professional agencies to cultivate their interests," he said.

Funds from the monthly talent searches will be used to aid the job placement and job development component of the "Stop The Killing" campaign.

What fuels Willie Ray's drive to reach these kids?

He just wants to see the killing stopped and alternative lifestyles presented to these kids.

"We're going after the five percent, the kids that people have written off as the lost generation.
