to withhold salary increases from the faculty and staff," said Jeffers.

"Our quarrel is with the city and the fact that they did not provide us with the additional money to pay for the increases," he continued.

The college board had no say in the negotiations between the city and the union, stated Jeffers.

Prior to negotiations, the city assured the college that they would add the necessary funds to the college budget to pay for salary increases, according to Jeffers.

"But now they are saying they will only give 50 percent of the money which means the college has to find the funding from someplace else in the budget," Jeffers stated.

If the college is responsible for funding the other 50 percent of the money needed to pay the salary increases, other college programs may suffer, said Jeffers.

"We feel it's the obligation of the city, which negotiated the agreement to fund that."

"Why should the college raise tuition for students when the city negotiated the salary increase?" he asked.

"We can increase the tuition but the city can raise money by increasing tax rates for everybody."

Jeffers pointed to the many businesses and corporations in the city which could contribute to the money raised from taxes.

"We can take some of that money and educate people who need it in Baltimore," he said.

The state increased funding to CCB by $1.1 million, said Jeffers. But the city decreased funding to the school by $300,000.

"That doesn't say much in my mind about the city's commitment to education.
